Alexandria Gazette

FRIDAY EVENING, AUGUST 18.

MEN OF UNBOUNDED STOMACH.-It WAS owing, in a great degree, to the wretched condition of their commissariat that the Austrians were defeated at Austerlitz. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we may die," is a motto which has often been denounced, and most justly, by Christian moralists. "Let us eat and drink well, lest to-morrow we die," would be a good substitute. The pleasures of the table are not the highest form of human enjoyment, it is true, but for all that, an oyster pie is a good thing when well made.

"A man," says Dr. Johnson, "who has no regard for his stomach, will have no regard for anything else." A French gourmand declared that the discovery of a new dish is more im portant than the discovery of a new star, be cause there never can be dishes enough, but there are stars enough already. It is a mistake to suppose that only brainless men, with full paunches and empty pates, have a keen relish for the luxuries of the table-that, as Shakspeare says. -Dainty bits

Make rich the ribs, but bankrupt quite the wits.

The celebrated scholar, Dr. Carr, confessed a love for "hot lobsters, with a profusion of shrimp sauce." Pope was a decided epicure. and would lie in bed for days at Bolingbrooke's unless he were told that there were stewed lampreys for dinner, when he would rise instantly and hurry down to table. Cleopatra is said to have owed her empire over ('æsar as much to her suppers as to her beauty, and who can tell how much the love of the Grand Monarch, Louis XIV, for Madame de Maintenou was owing to the invention of the immortal cutlets which bear her name?

Cardinal Wolsey was conciliated by the good dishes on the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and Agrippa won Claudius by a receipt for dressing Spanish onions. Handel ate enormously, and when he dined at a tavern always ordered dinner for three. On being told that all would be ready as soon as the company should arrive, he would exclaim: "Den bring up de dinner, prestissimo. I am de company.
